

Free East German elections make way for reunification

by Rainer Apel

The world will look much different after March 18, the day of the first free elections in East Germany since the end of the war. Whichever of the new political parties or alliances of parties wins the elections and forms the new government, it will operate together with the West German government of Chancellor Helmut Kohl in an entirely new political geometry.

This will be most strikingly documented in the high-level talks on German reunification between the Germans and the four Allied powers of World War II—the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Soviet Union—that are to begin shortly after March 18. It will be the first time since 1945 that representatives of freely elected bodies from all of Germany will negotiate on an equal status with the allies of the former anti-German coalition. Before these “two plus four” talks of the two Germanys plus the Four Powers, most diplomacy concerning “the German question,” the partition of Europe, cooperation between East and West in Europe, has proceeded from the basic fact that there was one German government that was freely elected and one that was not. The fact that the one part of Germany was never free to express its views, also limited the maneuvering room of the other. This will now change.

To many, and not only in the East, this is a threatening perspective. Even in France, the “closest ally of the Federal Republic” (to quote a recent statement by Chancellor Kohl), where the perspective of a “truly sovereign, reunited Germany” has publicly been endorsed by many of her political leaders, including President François Mitterrand and Foreign Minister Roland Dumas, the changes that are certain to come after the East German elections are still meeting deep skepticism among the political elites.

But imprisoned U.S. economist Lyndon LaRouche, in a statement released on Feb. 20, emphasized that the nations of the West must emphatically support the reunification moves, and quickly. “It is urgent to proceed very rapidly now,” he said, “with the monetary integration of the G.D.R. [East German] economy with the deutschemark of the Federal Republic of Germany. To delay would mean a catastrophe for all concerned.” All Americans should support this process of unification and the early step of monetary union, he stressed, particularly in view of the bankruptcy of the U.S. economy. “We do not have any more the means to re-start the U.S. economy on a full basis, by ourselves. We will depend upon Western Europe to the greater degree, Japan to a lesser degree, to bail the United States out of the collapse. And thus, if Europe does not proceed rapidly with an efficient unification of the two parts of Germany, we in the United States and most families in the United States and localities will suffer greatly. Therefore, all of us, worldwide, all people of good will and good sense, have a common interest in the success of this unification process.”

A chance for everybody, a threat to nobody

In West Germany, the prospects for rapid developments after the March elections are already shaping policy planning profoundly. In the second half of February, this became visible in three areas: the issue of self-determination, agriculture (food supply to the East), and nuclear power.

1) Self-determination: “Shevardnadze is simply wrong on German unity," declared Horst Teltschik, Chancellor Kohl's national security adviser, at a press briefing on Feb. 21. Teltschik said that the statement by Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze a few days before, that German reunification would "still take several years, at least," did not correspond to reality. "He will be wondering about the things to come," Teltschik declared, "because the pace of developments is neither determined by him nor by us—it is the people in the G.D.R. that are determining it. This, and nothing else, is self-determination."

A few days before, Bonn Foreign Ministry spokesman Günther Chrobog informed the press that West Germany aims at having the upcoming "two plus four" conferences result in "a phasing-out of the privileges of the Allied powers on German affairs." Chrobog added that "under no circumstances, will the talks take place at the Allied Control Council building in Berlin, because it should be clear from the start that the Allied powers are not the ones to determine the negotiations. We want talks on a parity level."

One of the keys to that development lies in France, which already agreed to unlock the doors to full German sovereignty. Another important key lies in the Kremlin. If Moscow accepts that principle of self-determination and sovereignty in the sensitive case of Germany, the doors would be swung wide open to the perspective of self-determination everywhere else in the world.

2) Securing food supplies in the East: "There will be enough food for the East, if necessary, also from East Germany," a senior official of the Ministry of Agriculture in Bonn told EIR on Feb. 21. "The surpluses we have in Western Europe will suffice to keep the level of food supply in the East at least at the level it is at now." He said that Bonn's policy is to "help with the modernization of the farm sector in the East, if they want it. Once they drop this crazy policy of food autarky, they'll become more flexible and can produce grain, feed grain, and certain categories of fruit and vegetables that are still hard to find there now."

The East German farm sector could become a "prosperous food supplier to the rest of Eastern Europe and even the Soviet Union, very soon," the official declared, adding that "since those countries are not part of the European Community and won't be before 1993, they will be able to produce what and how much they want, not being bound to any production quotas. Brussels [headquarters of the European Commission] has nothing to say in the East, not yet."

This reference to the Brussels quota system limiting food production in Western Europe is important: Once it is proven that substantial Western investments in the ailing Eastern farm sector can vastly increase the production of food in a relatively short period of time, a vital principle is established for the rest of the world, especially the starving developing sector.

Once a policy of investments is launched by the West German government, and it seems it is fully committed to do so in order to help secure food supplies in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, the era of anti-farming straitjackets is over. West Germany is the biggest single contributor of the European Community budget. Any substantial change in Bonn will necessarily affect the Community budget, and it is high time that the restrictive quota policy in Brussels be thrown out the window, that Europe's farmers be free again to mobilize their production potentials for the good of the world.

3) Nuclear power: Due to the growth of the ecologist movement domestically, and political blackmail from abroad (by the Carter administration in the United States, for example, and the Soviets), the West German nuclear power sector has been frozen at its current level, and exports of nuclear technology to the Third World are at a standstill. From 1969 to 1979, West Germany sold 20 turnkey nuclear power plants abroad; since then, none.

In order to remobilize the nuclear export sector, West German firms like BBC and Siemens-KWU have tried, over the past years, and even more so after the Chernobyl disaster of 1986, to convince the Soviet Union that West German power technology was the safest and, once produced in large enough quantities, also the fastest to get. The Soviets always said "no," but the Feb. 10 meeting between Chancellor Kohl and Soviet leader Gorbachov seems to have lifted the ban. A few days later, Siemens-KWU spokesman Heinrich von Pierer told the press that his company is well positioned to supply all of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union with the most modern turnkey nuclear power plants. They could be produced on a kind of assembly line, which would vastly reduce costs and production time. While the Soviet Union is not capable, as shown in the East German project of six new power plants that have been under construction in Stendal since 1976, to deliver the plants in less than 10-14 years, West Germany's nuclear power sector hopes to be able to do so in less than four years, by 1993.

For East Germany, nuclear power is the only way out of its present technology of lignite-based production of energy. For the rest of the world, a powerful, export-oriented nuclear power industry in Germany offers a viable chance of solving the chronic energy shortage.

Will Moscow keep its promises?

The central question to be answered is: Will the Soviet leadership stick to the spirit of "good cooperation and mutual friendship" that reigned at the meetings on Feb. 10 in Moscow between Kohl and Gorbachov? Will the Kremlin leaders see their advantage in keeping good company with the "goose that lays the golden eggs" of the productive industrial nations of Western Europe like Germany?

LaRouche, in remarks issued on Feb. 21, underlined that "Mr. Gorbachov is not nice, nor is he entirely a fool. He's only a simple thug, but he understands a few basic things. First of all, he understands, as the Soviets have been saying

How Kohl went with the LaRouche policy

Although the toppling of the Berlin Wall on Nov. 11 seemed to many like a bolt out of the blue, it was not so to those Western political and economic leaders not blinded to their zeal to bolster Mikhail Gorbachov's utterly failed perestroika restructuring program in the East bloc. Information is now turning up indicating that by mid-1989, a grouping around West German Helmut Kohl had paid careful attention to the recommendation issued by U.S. economist Lyndon LaRouche late in 1988, that the West offer Moscow substantial help in rebuilding the East European economies, in exchange for a Russian acquiescence to German reunification.

Chancellor Kohl reportedly first conveyed such a message to Gorbachov and the Soviet leaders at the peak of the refugee crisis in August-September 1989, and did so again in early December after the fall of the first transition government of the communists in East Berlin on Dec. 3.

Details of Kohl's communication with Gorbachov in 1989 are not known, but sources close to the chancellor leaked that he made an offer of the following kind: West Germany would provide substantial economic and financial assistance to reforms in the Soviet Union, for Eastern Europe and East Germany, on the condition that Moscow give the official go-ahead for German reunification and for a stabilization of the political reform process in all of the East European glacis. Kohl made the condition that a reunified Germany would remain in the Western alliance, and that it be a nation living under the Western paradigm of values. The chancellor urged Gorbachov to meet with him on the German issue as soon as possible, to have the stabilization of the East German economy begin without any further delay.

Kohl's message was buried in the drawers of the Kremlin, the reason being, as sources close to the chancellor believe, that Gorbachov was opting for a major strategic breakthrough at his scheduled Dec. 2-3 summit with U.S. President Bush at Malta, such that Soviet concessions on the German question would be unnecessary. In other words, Gorbachov, who is closely tied to the Anglo-American financial circles known as the "Trust," chose to collaborate with the American establishment spokesman Bush, whose country, as the Soviets should have known, was certainly not in a favorable economic condition to come forth with anything attractive to help the Kremlin out of its economic convulsions. Moreover, given the wreck which the U.S. economy has become, Bush would not have been able to help Gorbachov, even if Bush had wanted to do so.

Meanwhile, throughout the summer and early autumn of 1989, official Soviet propaganda kept hammering on Kohl's policy as being "revanchistic" and a "threat to peace and stability in Europe," and the ruling East German communist party, the SED, launched a broad campaign against the alleged "threat of neo-fascism encouraged by West Germany."

Thus, although Kohl's first personal encounter in December in Dresden with Hans Modrow, East Germany's transitional prime minister, was not unsuccessful in that at least it paved the way toward future rapprochement between the two German governments, Kohl's initiative for broader East-West cooperation was blocked and neglected by Gorbachov throughout December and January.

for over a year, that unless Mr. Gorbachov can put food on the table of the Russian people, that he's doomed, and that whoever can put food on the Russian table, is the accepted leader of all the Russians. . . . Mr. Gorbachov has caught on to the principle of the golden goose. Now, this doesn't require any great amount of learning on Mr. Gorbachov's part, since everybody in Moscow knows that the G.D.R. and the Czech economies were the backbone of the Soviet economy, and without the Czech and G.D.R. economies, the whole Russian economy goes ge-flop!"

Gorbachov himself, in an interview published in the Pravda Feb. 21, praised Chancellor Kohl as a "man of peace," which is even the more remarkable, as Kohl was addressing a crowd of 150,000 East Germans at a campaign event of the anti-socialist Alliance for Germany in the city of Erfurt.

Gorbachov went out of his way to stress that "the Germany of today is different. . . . There is no denying the German people have learned the lessons from Hitler's rule. . . . New generations matured in both German states. Their view of Germany's role in the world is different from the one that existed over the past 100 or so years and particularly in the period of Nazism."

Gorbachov pledged that the "Soviet Union will not stand in the way of German unity," claiming that the Soviet Union "has never stood in the way" of German unity in the past 40 years. Gorbachov gave a chronological rendition of past Soviet proposals for the creation of a united Germany, listing

Gorbachov's overdue response

At the beginning of February, Gorbachov suddenly sent a message to Bonn that he would like to see Chancellor Kohl in Moscow Feb. 10-11. The request for a meeting was presented as having the status of "utmost urgency," according to sources around Kohl in Bonn. Apparently, this was the long-expected official response from Gorbachov to the Kohl initiative of early December. The only reasonable explanation for Gorbachov's move was that he realized he was in deep trouble and recalled Kohl's offer, and was possibly willing to grant concessions on the German reunification issue in return for substantial economic aid from West Germany.

Whether aspects of this high-level communication between Bonn and Moscow got leaked to some analysts, or whether it was "in the air" by accident—the new situation was reflected at the International Wehrkunde Conference in Munich Feb. 2-4. Here, at the annual, high-powered gathering of about 200 leading NATO politicians, military and strategic analysts, the German issue and Moscow's views on it had become the center of the entire discussion.

In the midst of the heated discussion at that gathering, several speakers pointed out that the crisis of the Soviet empire has reached a point of no return. Moscow had only two options: either go in the direction of a military strike abroad or crackdown internally, or both; or, grant concessions in exchange for economic help.

"The Red Army," said Karl Kaiser, president of the German Foreign Policy Institute in Bonn, "can't really be used anymore for the reconquest of Eastern Europe . . . the classic instrument of Kremlin power politics, the military, has lost its geographical base of operation because of the changes caused by the revolutionary developments of the recent past."

"There are democracies in all of Eastern Europe now," said Kaiser, "and this means their armies would fight against the Red Army, should it try to reconquer what was lost on the political level. Even the NVA [East German army] would defend the G.D.R. achievements against Moscow."

While Kaiser, like most of the conference attendees, warned that the volatility of the situation in the Soviet Union meant immense dangers to peace, the former Dutch minister of defense, Willem van Eekelen, made an effort to spread confidence that Gorbachov's internal weakness would force him to make substantial concessions to the West. Van Eekelen said there was no time anymore for unconditional, Malta-style arms control concessions of the West to Moscow: "The West should not pay any price for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Eastern Europe. . . . The Soviets actually have only few options left, so I think that in the context of discussing troop level cuts, we should not pay any price when there is no need to pay a price."

Van Eekelen said that with "some good deal of certainty, the Warsaw Pact military organization will disintegrate, the Soviets will withdraw all their troops from Eastern Europe, and I am very certain that German reunification will come anyway. So why pay a price for something that is going to happen anyway?"

As for the confusion in the West about Gorbachov's strength, van Eekelen declared, "Gorbachov is a great prober. He tries something, to see if it works, and when it doesn't work, he'll come up with something else. So we should wait until he comes up with something else."

As the developments around Gorbachov's meeting with Kohl in Moscow documented, van Eekelen's evaluation was quite accurate. The Soviet leader made concessions.—Rainer Apel

March 1952 (the Stalin Note proposing a reunified but demilitarized Germany), the 1955 meeting of the Four Power foreign ministers, 1957, 1958, and finally again in 1959. He blamed the West for having prevented all these past chances for German unity from having materialized.

"The Germans themselves should decide on the state forms, the timing, and conditions for realizing their unity," Gorbachov said. But having said this, he proceeded to list as conditions the inviolability of European borders, including special guarantees for Poland's borders, and measures to preserve the "security" and "stability" in Europe. He did not cite neutrality of Germany as a condition. Gorbachov did reiterate what formed the centerpiece of the demands he put forward to Kohl in Moscow, namely economic conditions. Gorbachov stressed that German unification must not mean "moral, political or economic damage" for the U.S.S.R.

The reunification of Germany will cause no damage; indeed, it will help to repair the damage left behind by 70 years (in the Soviet case) or 45 years (in the case of Eastern Europe and the eastern part of Germany) of ruinous socialist policies. LaRouche's proposal for a productive triangle of industrial activity from Paris to Vienna to Berlin, thereby combining and developing the vast potentials of a reunified German nation with those of its most important neighbor and ally in the West, France, and of the neighbors in the East like Poland and Czechoslovakia, would work like an assembly line for laying "golden eggs."
