

Arab solidarity to an end. Fine. But, then there has to be some form of solidarity. Then we'll find ourselves faced with Islamic solidarity, with Iran pushed into the role of the leader of the region. Then the dream of pacification will come to an end. Then you will find the Islamic discourse taking over in a country like Saudi Arabia and so on. Then you will find the Islamic discourse acquiring an anti-imperialist content. And so the Middle East will prove even more intractable.

We are already witnessing something like that inside Palestine with the Intifada. The Hamas group—the Islamic group—is gradually winning over. Yes, there might be some redrawing of the map, but the unintended results of that will be far more important than the intended results.

EIR: What will be the likely effects of this war on the stability of Egypt?

Messiri: There will be a lot of reevaluation, both on the part of the government and the part of the opposition. It will all depend on the outcome of the war. Already, the factor of the metaphysics of the military superiority of the West has been punctured. Because here is the Western world afraid to engage Saddam Hussein on land. The fact that Saddam Hussein has survived for four weeks, and there is no end in sight; the fact that someone stood up to this military might all by himself, will put some ideas in the minds of some people.

Since 1967, one ingredient of Arab military doctrine has been that you can not engage Israel through regular armies, and that this should be left for the Palestinians to do in the form of uprisings and so on. That's why some Arab regimes were glad about the Intifada, because after all, it's happening there and they could forget about it. Now, Saddam Hussein is once more suggesting the possibility that you can build up militarily, that you can liquidate this Zionist enclave in the Middle East.

This will generate some destabilization in the region because you will have officers thinking, ideologues reconsidering, and so on. On the level of the masses, they will begin to ask, "Is this the end of Arab nationalism, the end of an Arab political order? Should a new order emerge with the Arab discourse integrated in the Islamic discourse?" It will result in a radical reevaluation of basic premises, and that will also result in the restructuring of political life in the region.

Red Cross appeals 'to all belligerents'

A spokesman for the Red Cross in Geneva told EIR on Feb. 7 that the international agency has eight representatives in Baghdad at the present time. Asked what he knows about the situation there, he said that they are not allowed to make their knowledge public, lest they be unable to continue their work. This is common Red Cross policy all over the world, he said. But the fact that the Red Cross published an appeal on Feb. 1, shows how urgently we view the situation, he added. "Such an appeal is very uncommon for us."

Here is the full text of the statement released by the International Committee of the Red Cross on Feb. 1:

The conflict now raging in the Middle East will inevitably bring widespread destruction, perhaps on a scale unprecedented in this part of the world. Millions of civilians have been caught up in the violence, without shelter or protection against occupation and bombardment. Growing numbers of combatants are falling into enemy hands. Hundreds of thousands of ground troops—most of them young men—are prepared to meet in a deadly confrontation.

The determination of the parties in conflict and the buildup of awesome means of destruction are a presage of irreversible devastation. When the veil of censorship is lifted, the full horror of the suffering inflicted on the peoples of the region, on the fighters and their families, will be revealed for all to see.

One of the most disquieting aspects of this conflict is the possibility that the law of war, which is the expression of the most basic and universal principles of humanity and of the dictates of the public conscience, might be swept aside by the political, military, or propaganda demands of the moment.

The right to choose methods or means of warfare is not unlimited. Weapons having indiscriminate effects and those likely to cause disproportionate suffering and damage to the environment are prohibited.

The wounded, whether civilian or military, and prisoners must receive special consideration and protection in compliance with specific rules which the entire international community has undertaken to respect.

The International Committee of the Red Cross therefore solemnly appeals today to all belligerents, in the name of all civilian and military victims, to have due regard for humanitarian considerations. To show respect for the victims and treat them humanely, in the spirit of the Geneva Conventions, is to recognize a heritage common to all mankind and thus pave the way to reconciliation. It is also the last chance of averting a tragedy even greater than the use of force.
